Di'Anno looks in his reflection: "My, am I a sore loser."

But this is not true. He's alright. Better looking than any of them other crooked teethed men in his band.

It's still early days but he knows he won't stick around, he's more into private gigs, small places and Iron Maiden's potential is huge and events are already spiraling.

He questions his voice, his faith. But they tell him he's doing fine. They lie about the latter.

Di'Anno has a thing for Steve. But doesn't everyone. 'Cause they're usually drunk or stoned: "You on one, mate?"

No, Di'Anno's sober.
